"FEATHER YOUR HAT" IS TO BE NEW SONG FOR SPRING

Milliners are beginning to sing "Feather your hats for Spring," and all those who heed the changing fashions will proceed to dress up their old hats in new feathers or put old feathers on new hats. Here are three feather-trimmed straw hats which show attractive treatment. Small soft quills uncured ostrich and burnt geese are some of the popular feathers used.

the stuff of which senators are made who enlist state pride.

In his previous senate experience he was always one of that body's most forceful and trenchant figures. He strode that green carpet with the unforgetting consciousness that he was a senator of the United States, with all that it implies of power and dignity. His imagination always visualized himself as having a responsible part in great events, and he had the intellectual strength to live up to his own exalted conception of the part he was called on to play.

Beveridge, when he was in the senate, was an outstanding figure. In a new senatorship he would, without any doubt, be far more so. In his early senatorship he had to stand comparison with such men as Dooliver, Hoar, Aldrich, Hale, Frye, Daniels and a score of others.

Would Stand Out.

The senate today contains no such aggregation of leadership. Beveridge, at the age of 60, in a new senatorship, would stand out inconspicuously in a way to appeal to the pride of state like Indiana. That Beveridge would restore to the senate some of the compelling interest it had in the public mind ten or fifteen years ago, goes without saying. The senate would become a vital body by much more than the addition of a single personality. Beveridge in action would re-charge the most droning chamber with some of the surplus of his own dynamic abundance.

Since his retirement he probably has made the most fruitful use of his time that any American statesman in retirement ever made. His life of John Marshall, even if he had no other public service to his credit, is a work of such outstanding quality in the world of literature and constitutional history as will undoubtedly commend him to a state that pays rather unusual deference to that kind of achievement.

New's Good Qualities.

At the time, no portrayal of this Indiana situation can be complete or fair that fails to do justice to Senator New's less striking, but no less valuable and dependable qualities. The men are so different, it is difficult to compare them justly. It is always baffling to try to compare a man whose especial and greatly useful virtue is keeping the ship afloat and pointed in the right direction, with one whose qualities are more striking and picturesque.

New is a Republican party man, and the Republican party's policies are his policies. If the country is to be managed by the Republican party along lines laid down by the party leadership in the White House or elsewhere, New in the senate will give 100 per cent of team work, and of strength in a multitude of ways. He does not depend on great initiative, or on striking qualities of leadership, to commend him; but rather on sure-footed common sense, loyalty, and the qualities that other men come to recognize as dependable wisdom.

New has qualities, which in his personal contacts, inspire deep affection and loyalty. There is not a senator of either party, and hardly a man in Washington, who would not feel poignant regret at seeing New retired from the senate, however they might feel about the issues involved.

Stand-Pat Republican

New, of course, belongs to the old stand-pat element in Indiana politics, and in that state the element that is described by contrast as progressive is very strong. When, in the presidential primary of two years ago, President Harding and Hiram Johnson contended, among others, for the Indiana delegates, Johnson beat Harding conspicuously.

If the coming senatorial primaries were to divide along lines comparable to those between Harding and Johnson, it would be extremely promising for Beveridge. But I am told that the coming cleavage, if there should be one, will not by any means duplicate that of Harding and Hiram Johnson. A good deal of Johnson's strength was wholly personal and came from the populous districts around Gary, in the northern end of the state, where he had roused the people personally by his speeches.

If Beveridge is to make headway, assuming that he enters the fight, he will need to get his strength in much the same way that Johnson got his; that is, by force of personality. He will have very little of the party organization. New will have the great bulk of that.

Needs Dramatic Fight

Beveridge will need to make the sort of fight which overwhelms party organizations in a landslide of unorganized popular support. Beveridge will need to stir up that feeling, which is always potential in any state and rather more so in Indiana than most states, of instinctive insurgency against the organization. He will need to capitalize his personality, his past public service, and the distinction that attended it, together with his new incarnation of distinction as the author of an incontestably great work, the Life of John Marshall.

When Beveridge and New, as well as the candidates for congress in the 13 Indiana districts, look forward from the primaries in May to the election in November they may well be troubled. Indiana is a doubtful state always. It is true that Harding carried it by close to 200,000. But everybody knows that is not normal. Much nearer normal was the scant 6,000 by which Hughes carried it over Wilson in 1916.

Recent Elections

There isn't a Republican politician in Indiana who would admit that the Republican strength there today is not what it was at Harding's election. In fact, there were some elections in Indiana two months ago whose results were not calculated to give comfort to the Republicans. Of 74 cities that elected mayors, 46 elected Democrats, 26 Republicans, and two were carried by Citizen's tickets. Whatever Republican wins these Indiana senatorial primaries in May will have a real fight in November.

The Democratic senatorial nomination seems much less near to crystallization than the Republican one. The Democrats who are "mentioned," as the political phrase is, are: Ex-Vice-President Thomas R. Marshall, ex-Senator Thomas Taggart and ex-Governor Samuel M. Ralston. (Copyright 1922 by the New York Evening Post, Inc.)

LONG JAIL SENTENCE SAVED JOHN BUNYAN BY WIFE'S EFFORTS

Elizabeth Bunyan, wife of John Bunyan, preacher, fighter and religious scribe of the Seventeenth Century, although little known, was one of the strongest and bravest characters ever known. Of such strong stuff was this woman made that she was able to bear the eccentricities of her genius husband and the misfortunes attendant upon these eccentricities.

Bunyan, who is famous chiefly as the author of "Pilgrim's Progress," spent a large part of his life in prison. Not enough of his life, however, to prevent him from being the father of six children, four of whom he already had when he took Elizabeth, whose previous history is entirely unknown, as his second wife.

Shortly after the wedding Bunyan's trouble with the Commonwealth government began, and he was sentenced to a jail term. During his incarceration, while Bunyan was writing "Pilgrim's Progress," Elizabeth found time in addition to her work and taking care of the children, to make the difficult journey to London, a big undertaking in those days, to petition Parliament to set her husband free from his illegal imprisonment. The poor woman was sent from pillar to post in the House of Lords, meeting with no success. Finally she saw the judges and though she could not free her husband, she gained partial liberty for him, and he was able to preach.

Wait Until the Targets Come Up!

THE marksmen on the firing-line of a rifle range hold their fire until the squares of white paper emerge from the distant pits—and then they blaze away!

The perfect scores are made by the sharpshooters who time their shots for that brief interval between the rise and dropping of the targets.

The expert shoppers wait to do most of the buying for their families and their homes until the little "Specials at the Stores" targets appear in the Merchandise columns of the classified section.

They take advantage of the brief shopping opportunities to get special prices on all sorts of things they need all the time.

You can realize substantial savings on almost everything you ordinarily buy—if you will watch for the appearance of these "target" ads.
