ON THE WAY

Chapter 48.

Cora laughed at Millie, even while she sincerely sympathized. In a little town, people see so much of each other that any sort of deception is almost impossible. Besides, Cora, Maude and Millie had played together as babies, had seen each other nearly every day during the process of education, falling in love, marrying and settling down. Cora saw through Millie's little pretences, into the real and likeable woman beneath. The only time she was deceived was when Paul came, and Millie began a puzzling change. And she never even to the end, connected it with the young man from New York.

She saw instantly, though, that Humphrey's letter, while it was evidently a relief, also spoiled Millie's present little attitude.

"Do you think she really cares for him?" Maude said late that day, as the two women sat for a moment on the little kitchen porch.

"Yes," Cora answered emphatically. "Don't you?"

"No," Maude was equally certain. She really enjoyed posing as a forlorn widow, or deserted wife, or whatever it was she thought herself. She can't do that any more. As things stand now, Humphrey did nothing worse than go away without telling her he was coming back. She made an interesting and appealing picture. She can't do that any more—and she'll never forgive him for it."

Cora felt she should have been shocked at this frank and rather unfriendly summing up of Millie. But she had a remarkably logical mind for a woman and she had to admit it was true.

"At the same time," she defended Millie, "she's awfully fond of him. If you could have seen her face—how relieved—"

"I could—wasn't I there?" "I don't believe you like Millie."

"Yes, I do. I'll miss her awfully," Maude answered.

Mrs. Werner, feeling that the social duties of the town had to be kept up by her, gave Mrs. Parke, Millie and Patty a farewell party. And at the end of it they turned out and escorted the three guests of honor to the station and stood about "seeing them off."

They were to take one of the big through trains from the coast that stopped on signal at the station.

It was after midnight, so the last view of Wissagegan was the irregularly lighted station, the crowd of people waving caps and handkerchiefs, and far over on the left, the black shadows where Humphrey's big lumber yard was, and the sheen of the river where the water caught the red or green of an occasional railway light.

"What a crazy way for people to sleep on a shelf, like bottles of jam," Mrs. Parke commented, when she first saw her berth in the sleeper. "I don't other and tower among streets that seem like cracks in a granite wall. She listened with pleasure to their comments of awe or admiration.

"Well, we're here," Millie said finally, enthusiastically.

"Yes, we're here," Mrs. Parke's tones were very doubtful.

"We're here," Patty said it to herself, breathing it out towards the buildings of the great city that held her fate and her future.

Pelletier Is Disbarred

From Court Practice

(By Associated Press)

BOSTON, May 8.—The disbarment of Joseph C. Pelletier, recently removed as district attorney of Suffolk county, was ordered by decision of Judge Carroll, of the supreme court, today. Pelletier had entered no defense, contending that he was forejudged by reason of his removal. The charges were the same—conspiracy to extort money and improper action in securing and in quashing indictments.
