Labor difficulties are blamed for the series of dynamite explosions which wrecked four houses, under construction, in Garfield Heights, a suburb of Cleveland. Charges under two other houses failed to explode. Two sticks of dynamite near these buildings were stepped upon and broken by firemen and searchers. Fire followed the blasts. Loss is set at $30,000. An infant son of J. P. Forhan, in a home near the dynamited buildings, was blown from his crib and showered with broken glass, but escaped unhurt.

Wrecked locomotive after being derailed near Indianapolis.

State and federal officials are probing the wreck of a Pennsylvania freight train near Indianapolis in which an open switch, believed to have been tampered with, sent the locomotive and nineteen cars into the ditch. Evidence of tampering with switches has been found in connection with three similar wrecks. A recent wreck near Gary, Ind., showed intentional destruction of equipment.
