POSTAL MARKET IS SUGGESTED AS H. C. L. REMEDY

Notre Dame Professor Pre-sents Plan to Government for Immediate Action.

Thousands of American citizens fighting the high cost of living by the purchase of army food distributed through the U. S. post office, will be pleased to know that this cheap method of marketing may be adopted upon a wider scale.

Prof. Robert Lee Green, dean of the college of pharmacy at the University of Notre Dame claims that the government is acting upon his suggestion of postal markets in this present distribution, and is confident that the rest of his plan will yet be adopted. Prof. Green has for five years past been attacking expensive methods of distribution, and has been urging upon the post office department his plan for "postal markets," a part of which has demonstrated its usefulness in the present crisis.

Presents Method.

The method as advocated by Prof. Green follows:

"To establish a postal market or federal food exchange, it would be necessary to have a suitable building for a market house near the postoffice where all sorts of foods would be exposed for sale in standard grade and in standard packages. A great deal of food is already put up in this way, namely, butter in pound packages, milk in pint and quart bottles, bread in loaves of a standard weight, berries and small fruit in crates and boxes, apples, peaches, pears, oranges and grape fruit all come in standard boxes, standard pack and standard grades.

"Other foods, fruit and vegetables could be put up in a similar way and classified as fancy, good, medium and common, with price adjusted accordingly. This grading and packing would be done by the producer in conformity with the regulations of the market master.

"The food would proceed from farm to the postal market by the motor truck service which is established already in certain localities. Until this truck service becomes general, the farmers would haul their produce to the market themselves. Producers would get their pay immediately on acceptance of their produce by the market master. This would eliminate book accounts.

"A postoffice official would act as market master and would employ an adequate force of clerks to handle the work. The market master would keep in active touch by telephone with the producers in his territory and would know each day what kind of food was available and in what quantity. This information would be tabulated on a card system and used in disposing of food in excess of local need. He would report the surplus to the county market master who in turn would report to the state official who would report to Washington. The county, state and national organization would thus act as a sort of clearing house for all foods, surplus as well as deficiency. With such an organization, surplus food would proceed to the point needed by the shortest and quickest route, being very mobile and instantly responsive to all demands."

Could Use Phones.

"People could visit the postal market and carry home their purchases or they could order by telephone specifying the grades desired and have it sent out on the regular delivery and be sure of getting exactly what was wanted. There would be two deliveries a day, early morning and one in the afternoon, each carrying man as well."

"Delivery would proceed from the postoffice in motor vans to the assigned locality. Then, push carts would be used to complete the delivery from the van to the home, utilizing for the work the wire baskets, 12 inches by 16 inches, by six inches deep. A cart three feet high, four feet wide, and six feet long would hold 96 baskets of such dimensions. The van would move one block at a time and stop to refill the carts when empty. To facilitate the work each patron would have a box at the curb to receive the basket, and to still further save time and effort these baskets should be arranged in groups of five, for adjoining neighbors. Two baskets would be needed for each patron. The carrier would remove the empty one and leave the filled one."

Use Cash Basis.

"To avoid bookkeeping the service would be done on a strictly cash basis. A bill would accompany each delivery, and on the following day this bill with the exact change in a sealed envelope would be put in the empty basket and left in the mail box. If two consecutive bills remained unpaid, delivery would be suspended until adjustment had been made at headquarters."

"Such a centralized and properly coordinated system would reduce the delivery charges to a minimum and save a vast amount of man power which is so precious at present.

"It would not be difficult to establish a postal market. The frame work of the organization is already at hand and for successful operation.

An extension of this organization is all that is needed. Coordinate the food administration with the post office and the thing is done."
