Adele Garrison's New Revelations of a Wife "Their Second Honeymoon"

HOW WILLIAM TRUMBULL CARRIED OUT MADGE'S ORDER.

The wild fantastic suspicion which had flashed into my mind at my first glimpse of the glove upon the hand of the peddler in the bizarre disguise almost fled, as through a crevice of the breakfast room door I watched him inspect the catch of the pantry window and lool; carefully over the dining room, the while believing that Katie and I were both absent from the kitchen.

The man was but a common burglar, I told myself scornfully, as the inspection of the dining room completed he returned with the cat-like tread he had used in entering the pantry to his waiting attitude beside the kitchen door. He was probably making a tour of the village, pretending to sell the crude notions he carried in order to gain entrance to as many houses as possible with a view to robbing them later on. It was plainly my duty to detain him on some pretext, and to send for the local police at once.

And yet, the same psychic impulse which had driven me down the stairs in Katie's wake to see this itinerant peddler, when ordinarily I would have sent him some money by the girl and dismissed him, held me. I resolved to wait for Katie's return to the kitchen before I entered again with the money for the pencils and small metal pencil cases I had bought.

I wanted also to be sure that William Trumbull had time to come from the barn with the armful of kindling I had summoned him to bring in order that I might prove false or true the suspicion I had concerning the pseudo Italian waiting beside the door.

I had not long to wait before I heard the tattoo of Katie's hurried footsteps entering the kitchen. I heard her pause and knew she was looking at the waiting man outside. Then she came through the pantry and went on into the dining room, evidently in search of me. As noiselessly as possible I slipped from my hiding place behind the breakfast room door and followed her into the dining room.

"Did you find William?" I whispered, putting my lips close to her ear.

Katie answered, also in a whisper. Then with a sudden chuckle she added: "William, he ask me if you want him bush dat guy's head in for hem. He bring one beag stick along. He say he have eet handy if dat guy gets funny. I tink he coom now already yet."

I pushed Katie aside and fairly flew to the kitchen door, I had had experience with William Trumbull's truculence, especially when my half-witted old protegee thought I was in any danger. I didn't wish him to get into any controversy with the man at the door, although I had a secret feeling of relief at the assurance that William's strength and devotion were at hand.

With his arms full of kindling, William was just coming up the steps of the kitchen porch as I reached the door. If the man at the door had been watching him inspect the pantry window, his suspicions of something unusual would have been aroused.

Words that Betray. For William, his vanity and self-importance tickled to the utmost by the commissioner I had sent him, was wearing a most portentous expression—a combination of cunning and determination. As soon as he saw me he began to wink and nod his head and to convey his faith in a series of signals designed to show me that he understood my message asking him to stumble accidentally so that he would hit the peddler's inconspicuously gloved hand.

Even with my terror of the man before me I had hard work to keep my face free from smiles. But I flatter myself I kept it absolutely expressionless.

"Put that kindling in Katie's wood box, William," I said, "and then get another load."

As I spoke I moved to one side of the door so that William, in order not to disturb me, would have to walk on the right side of the pseudo. Then I held my breath, figuratively and actually, as William, all the importance of his mission written on his face, started to pass the man, stumbled, letting some of the kindling fall, and adroitly managed to strike his hand smartly, but with every appearance of accident, against the gloved hand of the peddler.

The effect was electrical. The man jumped as if a bullet had struck him, an agonized expression crossed his face, and he fairly spat two words at William—two words similar to the one I had heard in Lillian's study.

From my lips burst an exclamation, suppressed almost as it escaped, but still distinctly audible to the enraged man. He turned abruptly cast one glance into my face, where he must have read recognition, and then turning, took to his heels, not toward the street, but down toward the pond, which was the rear boundary of our place and that owned by the Durkees.
