WHY MADGE CAME BACK FROM THE WALK ALONE.

I heard Dicky give a sharp intake of the breath, and realized that I must no longer postpone my answer to the question he had asked me.

I forced myself to raise my eyes to his. What I had to say to him must be said boldly. It was no time for shrinking.

"My love is strong enough to stand anything, Dicky," I said, and believed that I spoke the truth, "but oh, my dear, I cannot make the same assertion for my respect and belief in you."

My husband's face hardened.

"So you're one of the jingoes," he said unpleasantly. "The trifling master of my leaving you and my mother penniless and unprotected if I did go, of course, hasn't occurred to you. Besides, it would break mother's heart."

I shook my head.

"Dicky, dear," I said softly, "of course it would, and mine, too. But that's what we women have to face these days, the heartbreak that is the hardest of all. And as for leaving your mother penniless, you know that is foolish. There's plenty of your own money in the bank, if used solely for her spending money, to last a long time. And, you forgot me."

"I earned my own living and that of my own little mother for years. I could certainly do the same for your mother, to say nothing of the funds my father left for me when he went to South America. There's no possible reason, financially, why you shouldn't feel free to go."

Dicky gave a short hard laugh.

"Of course it would be so pleasant for mother to live upon your bounty," he said.

"Not in the least."

If I hadn't caught the note of pain beneath his perverseness I should have been bitterly angry at him. But I have lived with Dicky long enough to know when he is uttering his true sentiments and when—as he so often does—he's simply giving voice to anger to which he has worked himself up without cause. That I had hurt him cruelly, I knew, but there was no way in which I could soften the blow. I made an effort to turn his attention to something else.

"Suppose we don't refer to this again," I suggested, as soon as I could command my voice to steady.

"It can only bring pain to both of us, and there's no way of changing things."

"Tell me more about those illustrations you're to make for the aviation serial."

One thing brought me relief. The Chinese vase had not been tampered with. Either I had been mistaken about Cousin Agatha or she hadn't dared to enter my room in the face of my precautions. But I resolved to take the precious paper to Lillian's with me every day securely concealed about my person. I must prove to my own satisfaction that neither Agatha nor Katie suspected my use of the vase as a hiding place before entrusting it to for any length of time the important documents I was guarding.

I ate a hurried luncheon, to which, fortunately, Cousin Agatha didn't come down on the plea of a headache, and spent the afternoon getting my personal affairs and wardrobe in readiness for the coming days I expected to spend in the city doing the work Lillian had planned for me.
