Revelations of a Wife

Their Second Honeymoon

BY ADELE GARRISON.

WHAT HAPPENED WHEN COUSIN AGATHA APPEARED ON THE SCENE.

Here Villum, you drink this vunce. You vant get oop, dance vun tango."

Katie's voice rang out cheerily, and her smile as she proffered the cup of coffee to William would have heartened a man in worse plight than his.

William raised himself on his elbow and took the coffee. I noticed with much gratification that his hand was comparatively steady, and that his pallor had been replaced by a faint color. I judged that he would be nearly himself again very shortly.

"Thank ye, Katie," he said gratefully, lying back again when he had drained the cup. "That tasted awful good."

"Taste like more, Villum?" Katie asked teasingly, but I interposed. "Tell her."

"After a while, Katie," I decided. "I think he will be able to come into the house after a while. Then you can fix him up a nice light supper. You would better go back to the house now. Mother Graham or her cousin may need you."

"I tink I hear dot cousin-vomans movin' round oopstairs ven I coom bring coffee," Katie returned apprehensively. After much strenuous effort I had broken Katie of referring to Cousin Agatha as "dot old devil vomans," and she had devoted the epithet of "dot cousin-vomans," with which I didn't think it worth while to interfere.

"Vot I tell her if she ask vera you are, and vot's matter Villum?"

"How William Wou," "Tell her," I began, but stopped abruptly, for my ear had caught the swish of a skirt in the barn below.

"Is that you, Cousin Agatha?" I called, making my voice as cheery and nonchalant as I could. "Have you needed Katie?"

Cousin Agatha mounted the short staircase rapidly. I saw that she didn't intend to lose the opportunity to find out the reason for my presence and Katie's in poor William's room.

"Oh, I suppose I can prepare your mother-in-law's lunch and my own myself," she said with the martyr-like air which always sets my nerves on edge. "It's only that I dislike leaving Harriet alone while I do it. But if you need Katie here—her eyes swept poor old William's bandaged head contemptuously, "why, I—"

"I don't need Katie at all," I returned quietly, with a caustic mental comment on the fact that her comment on leaving her kinswoman alone had not prevented her from making a trip to the barn. "She can go back with you at once. In fact, she has only been out here a minute or two. She brought a cup of coffee to William."

Cousin Agatha waited perceptibly. I knew that she was wild with malicious curiosity as to the manner in which William had received his wounds, but that she wouldn't put a direct question to me until she was sure I meant to volunteer no information.

As she always managed to do, she had brought on one of my perverse moods. Unmindful of the possible indiscretion in arousing her anger, I turned to William again, as if the conversation were finished.

"What is the matter with William?" she asked in honeyed accents a moment later.

"He was out with his dog in the woods," I returned, "and a dead tree fell not exactly on him, else he wouldn't be here, but the branches lacerated his scalp rather badly. He's feeling much better, however, and I think he will be all right again in no time."

I had faced her as I began speaking, and I saw that she didn't believe the tale I had invented on the spur of the moment to account for William's condition. The crafty, suspicious look I knew so well came into her eyes.

"He will be all right if infection doesn't set in," she said. "Did you cleanse and bandage the wounds yourself?"

"I did," I returned curtly. "You'll pardon me, I know, Margaret," she purred, "if I suggest that was rather a rash thing for one of your inexperience to do. You cannot foresee the consequences of a failure to make those wounds thoroughly antiseptic. I think I would better look at them and make sure everything is all right. I have had so much experience in emergencies you know."

She moved toward William and stooped over him, her long, capable fingers fairly quivering with inquisitive eagerness—already busy with one of the bandages.
