Revelations of a Wife

My Heart and My Husband

BY ADELE GARRISON

WHY MADGE WORRIED AS SHE WATCHED DICKY.

I mentally brushed Bess Dean's mischievous threat aside as if it had been an annoying insect. I knew enough of the girl to realize that she would endeavor to monopolize Dicky's attentions during the dinner and reception to which she had been invited. She is the flamboyant, assertive type of pretty girl, who is never content unless she has the most attractive man in the room bending over her chair and neglecting all social amenities for her sake. But though I realized this, my attitude might cause me petty annoyance later in the day, I was too absorbed in the haunting fear that Dicky might not cover himself with glory in the afternoon exercises to pay much attention to anything else. Yet I couldn't help noticing that when she had settled her class in their seats she left them and went back to the desk of trophies and bent over it as if making some trifling rearrangement.

Miss Holcombe's Comment.
"Pipe the pose!" The sibilant whisper rose from the row of high school pupils seated directly behind me, but when I turned every face in the row was glacially respectful.

Miss Holcombe, however, who had been long enough in the Bayview school to know the very thoughts of the youngsters in her charge, spoke in a low tone without turning her head.
"George Brooks, come here a moment, please."

The boy in question, a chubby, black-eyed youngster, so brimming with mischief that he was always in hot water, hastened to her side, his round face and big eyes the personification of wondering innocence.

"If this affair bothers you, George," Miss Holcombe drawled with the utmost affability, "you may go to your classroom and spend the time in demonstrating geometry theorems. You can use them in your monthly report standings, you know."

George flushed, for his low standards in mathematics were proverbial. "I don't know what you mean, Miss Holcombe," he protested earnestly. "I wasn't—"

"Oh, yes you do, George, and you were," Miss Holcombe responded. "I haven't listened to your weak voice of yours all these years without knowing it. You may go back to your seat if you can keep quiet. But the next disturbance will be punishable by something else than geometry theorems."

The boy returned to his seat and good behavior, but his whispered exclamation remained with me. I think Alice Holcombe appreciated it, too, for her eyes rested upon Bess Dean with a quizzical light in them.

Bess Dean forgot.
For the girl was unmistakably rosy, and I had to admit that she was remarkably effective as she picked up one of the small shells Dicky had brought back with him and examined it closely. She has a remarkably good figure, lissome, slender without being too thin, and it was well outlined by the gown she wore, a one-piece dress of brown cloth cut to almost a daring V at the front and back of the bodice, with bands of fur outlining the V-shaped neck, the wrists and setting off the bottom of the skirt. The gown was of a shade which had been cunningly and artistically designed to bring out the mahogany shading of her masses of brown hair, the tawny lights in her really wonderful brown eyes. I was not surprised when, seated with me, the door with Mr. Stockbridge, he gave a slight start of surprised admiration, for I knew that the girl made a picture calculated to appeal to the soul of any artist.

She glanced up in pretty simulated confusion as Mr. Stockbridge formally and unsmilingly introduced her to Dicky, murmured something which we could not hear, but which was evidently an apology for allowing her interest in the trophies to engross her, and walked back to her position near the rear of the room. It was apparently the most trivial and natural of incidents, but I knew that she had accomplished a well defined purpose—that of bringing herself to Dicky's attention in so striking a manner that he would remember her above the score of other young women to whom he would naturally be introduced at the close of the afternoon's exercises.

Bess Dean and her vagaries, however, were quickly swept out of my mind by the quick fulfillment of the fear which haunted me all through the day. For when Dicky had taken the seat on the platform to which Mr. Stockbridge assigned him, and the principal had given the signal to the school orchestra to begin a musical selection, what was my horror to see my husband unfold my manuscript which he had pasted together, and look it over as if he were refreshing his memory concerning it!

SOME UNUSUAL WAYS TO SERVE CHOPS.

Although loin and kidney chops are considered more choice, and are usually more costly, the chops from the forequarter actually are as tender and flavorful. They are somewhat less in price because there is more bone to each chop, but they are good as the more expensive kind, and can be prepared the same way.

Chops may be broiled—or grilled, as it is sometimes called—they may be lightly sautéed or fried in deep fat. If deep fat frying is desired, dip each chop into egg and crumbs to which salt and pepper have been added, and fry in deep, hot fat for about seven minutes. Then drain on paper. If the chops are to be sautéed dip in flour and place in frying pan, fry about 10 minutes on each side. Chops should not be broiled more than five minutes on each side over a clear, hot fire.

Stuffed Mutton Chops.
4 thick chops.
1 tablespoonful of butter.
1 tablespoonful of flour.
1-2 cupful of stock or hot water.
1-2 cupful of chopped almonds.
Salt, pepper.

Melt the butter and blend with flour. Gradually stir in stock or hot water, rubbing well until bubbling then add the chopped almonds salt and pepper, and let boil. Remove from the fire and set aside to get hard. Slice the thick chops to the bone, and fill each slit with the almond mixture. Skewer together with toothpicks, then broil slowly for 10 minutes, turning on both sides. Serve hot with creamed carrots, cauliflower or other watery vegetable.

Casserole of Pork Chops.
4 chops.
2 cupfuls of thinly sliced potatoes.
1 teaspoonful of salt.
1 teaspoonful of pepper.
1 cupful of boiling water.
Flour.

Place the thinly sliced potatoes on bottom of greased baking dish, sprinkle seasoning. Cover with the chops and seasoning, also a sprinkling of flour, pour hot water over all and bake for 40 minutes in a hot oven. Cooked lima beans may be used instead of potatoes, and a dash of Worcestershire should be used in cooking.

Stuffed Lamb Chops.
6 chops, 1-2 in. thick.
2-3 tablespoonsful of butter.
1 tablespoonful of chopped onion.
2 tablespoonsful of flour.
1-2 cupful of chopped mushrooms.
1 teaspoonful of chopped parsley.
1-4 teaspoonful of salt.
1-8 teaspoonful of pepper.

Melt the butter and brown the onion in it lightly, then add the chopped mushrooms, and cook for about five minutes. Mix flour and 1-2 cupful of water or stock to a smooth paste, pour into the cooking mixture with rest of the seasoning. Spread this between top and bottom layer of each chop, which is sliced to the bone, skewer together, and broil for 10 minutes.

Chops may also be flattened first with a potato masher and then broiled quickly on a lightly greased pan, turning frequently.
Serve plain broiled chops with green peas or creamed potatoes that have been lightly browned in oven a few minutes before serving. The more delicate vegetable like asparagus, cauliflower, mushrooms, oyster plant or "salsify" combine with chops rather than the coarser starchy vegetables.
