Revelations of a Wife

My Heart and My Husband

BY ADELE GARRISON

WHAT ALICE HOLCOMBE ASKED OF MADGE

"What really happened?" Alice Holcombe looked the door behind her, and put her lips to my ear before she whispered the words.
"I don't know anything," I whispered back, stressing the verb.
"But you suspect. Tell me. I've been on pins and needles ever since I heard the story. Ken Stockbridge isn't as awkward as that. He must have broken that bowl on purpose. And he did it—from what I deduced while Milly was serving you fruit punch. There's only one answer to that."
"I am afraid you have it," I said somberly.
She put her hand to her heart with an involuntary, unconscious gesture. Her face was white with horror, save for two hectic splashes of color in her cheeks.
"Poor Ken!" she murmured brokenly. "I was afraid it would come to something like this. I have felt that she was more than half-insane, and distinctly dangerous for a long time. But—poison—"
The word was so low that I knew it was inaudible outside the room, but I couldn't repress a frightened exclamation.
"Hush!" I said. "Don't say that again."

A Swift Change
"You are right," she returned contritely. "Indeed, I shall never refer to this episode again. But you, we, all of us, must be on our guard from now on, now that we know of what her poison brain is capable. Tell me one thing, did she mean to include both you and Ken—"
She broke off abruptly then began again impatiently. "What I'm getting at is whether you think Ken is in any danger."
I hesitated before I replied, at the memory of Milly Stockbridge's face when she said to her husband: "Certainly, if you wish it."
"I don't think he is in danger from any deliberate plan," I said at last. "But, of course, if he angers her—"
"He will never do that," she spoke with decision. "He is angelic tenderness itself to her."
She turned away and busied herself with her wraps. When next she spoke I hardly knew her voice so charged it was with bitterness. "Did you ever know it to fail," she demanded, "that an utterly unloved woman will have double, triple, aye, a hundred times her share of love and tenderness lavished on her, while other—"
She stopped short as if some one had wiped the words from her lips. "It's a good thing you don't say any attention to my ravings," she said lightly. Here, let me help you on with your cloak. What a vision you are! Your husband ought to be the proud gentleman to be taking you home. I suppose poor old Donkey Donkers is trembling in his shoes for fear I'll propose to him on the way home. Do you know, every time that man opens his mouth I expect to hear a bray?"

The Final Picture
Her voice, her eyes, dared me to remember anything she had inadvertently betrayed. I took her cue instantly, the while my heart ached for her, the mate fashioned for Kenneth Stockbridge, who must stand helplessly aside and watch the wreck of his life and happiness.
"I had the same feeling myself when I was listening to him tonight," I laughed. "He certainly would win the endurance medal in a conversational match, wouldn't he?"
"If it were given for long-windedness, yes," she retorted, opening the door and sweeping down the stairs, in taxi the three figures were silhouetted against the reluctant suspicion with which ponderous Mr. Donkers invested his escort.

With her husband's arm around her, Milly Stockbridge went through her good-by to us almost as mechanically as a well-trained parrot would have done. She looked at Dicky and Alice Holcombe, but never once raised her eyes to meet mine.
"I am afraid the evening has been too much for Mrs. Stockbridge," Dicky said sympathetically.
"Oh no," her husband replied brightly. "She will be all right tomorrow. But she isn't strong, is extremely nervous, and my unlucky accident to her cherished punch bowl upset her terribly. It is all my fault."
"No, no!" his wife murmured half-hysterically, shrinking closer to him.
"I saw him soothe her with a touch as he put out his other hand to Alice Holcombe."
"Run over tomorrow, Alice, can you?" he asked casually. "Milly says she wishes to see you."
"Of course," Alice Holcombe promised carelessly. "Good-night, Milly."
She put her lips lightly to the cheek of the woman who had robbed her of the greatest blessing earth held for her. As Dicky and I went down the steps to our waiting taxi the three figures were silhouetted in the light of the electric porch lamp. The man, the wife, the faithful friend to them both. I couldn't repress a little shiver at the hopelessness of the situation. How would it all end?

should turn out to be untrue? Are you sure about it?
Is the man really in love with the woman?
Will he stay in love with her, do you think?
What sort of a fellow is he, anyway, worth while in any other way at all?

Could You Help Him?
Maybe you could help him out of a miserable muddle if you spoke to him instead of his wife—you say you are a friend of both. Perhaps he's tired of the affair already, and just wants an excuse to tell his wife all about it and be forgiven.
What would I want you to do for me in such a case? I would want you to tell me quick.

I don't want to waste my life "pretending." I'd rather live alone on a desert island, with the buzzards for company, than to pour out my heart to one who deceived me. I'd rather scrub floors for a living than take one penny from a man who couldn't tell me the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth.
Yes, I can see how a woman might hesitate before she left a man who is the father of her children, not only for the children's sake, but for her own.

At last, they get selfish. They get material as they grow older. I know women who were once decent, self-respecting beings who live now with men, and pretend to love them, and they hate the very ground those men walk on, and live a lie from one dreadful day's end to the other.

All a Great Puzzle.
I might be one of those women—I might prefer ease, quiet, comfortable deceit to honest misery and desperate courage—but I'd want the chance to choose.

Yes, it is a responsibility. I don't advise you to tell the woman and I don't advise you not to tell her. Think it over, put yourself in her place, with her disposition, and then do what you think is best.
Of course, there are many who agree with your mother. Perhaps they are right, I can't say, but really nowadays women are expected to have a right to know these things and act according to their conscience about them.
Just as that good mother of yours if ever her generation really respected the woman who shut her eyes to her husband's "goings on" just because it was the easiest way out of an uncomfortable position.

It is all a great puzzle, isn't it?
That the Peace Conference approved a war upon Mexico to be declared after the election of the next American president, it is a statement made by Prof. Frederick Starr.

Winifred Black Writes About:

A Problem of "Telling"

I have a friend, a good woman, a sweet woman and a clever woman. Her husband is unfaithful to her, and I think I ought to tell her about it. It seems to be so tragic for her to waste her unselfish devotion upon one so unworthy of her.
What would you do—stand idly by and see a good woman throw her life away upon an unworthy husband, or open her eyes to the truth, and then help her to get over it all? My mother says to keep silent because "it's none of my business."

SINCERE.
What shall you do? That depends upon the friend, and upon you. Is your friend a REAL woman, or is she a little creature who will just weep and storm and upbraid, and let it go at that?

Is she a person who has any kind of life of her own that she would like to live? Is she giving that life up because she is blindly devoted to a man who deceives her?
Has she pride, self-respect, self-reliance, truth, courage, honor? Or is she just a little nonentity who would live with any man and be what she calls "a good wife to him"—as long as he gave her a wedding ring and called her Mrs. Somebody or other?

What if the story you told her
