

DEVOTED TO THE INTERESTS OF WOMEN

Clubs Circles SOCIETY Suffrage Philanthropy

The last of a number of prenuptial affairs complimenting Miss Evelyn Tothukha whose marriage to John C. Reynolds will take place this afternoon at 4 o'clock, was the bridal dinner given Friday evening by Mrs. Palmer C. Trulsen at her home, 116 North Shore dr. Dinner was served at 6:30 o'clock at a beautifully appointed table centered with yellow daisies and candelabras. A corsage bouquet of yellow daisies and sweet-heart roses marked the place of the bride-to-be while place cards bearing miniature brides and grooms marked the places of Mr. Reynolds, Mr. and Mrs. Fred Gibbs, Mr. and Mrs. Earl Thomas, of Chicago; Miss Belle Livingston, Norman Adler and Mr. and Mrs. Trulsen.

The sixth annual banquet given by the Mary Ann club was held in the Administration building Thursday evening. The speaker of the evening, Mrs. Judith W. Laewenthal, of Chicago, who is associated with Jane Addams, of Hull House, chose for her subject, "The Woman of Tomorrow," which dealt with social and economic conditions. Miss Hazel Pomeroy, the president of the club, acting as toastmaster, gave a brief history of the club's activities during the past year. Miss Madeline Unger responded to the toast, "Hard Knocks," and Miss Emma Prytz to "Looking Forward," which was a glimpse into the future of the Mary Ann. Vocal selections were given by the Misses Lucy Maliska, Thelma Helquist, Florence Peterson and Genevieve Doyle.

The Optimist club held its regular monthly meeting Friday afternoon at the home of Mrs. J. C. Gaskill, 406 E. Monroe st., with nine members and several guests in attendance. After the business session there was a program consisting of readings by Miss Elizabeth Barter, Mrs. F. B. Barnes, Mrs. Frank Reese and Miss Alizina Truesdale, of Angola, Ind., who is chairman of the program committee of the Indiana Association of Workers for the Blind. Vocal selections were rendered by Lee Pattison and instrument solos by Herman Wilson. Frank Reese and Herman Wilson have been appointed delegates to the district convention of Federated clubs to be held at Elkhart Wednesday, May 5.

Mrs. E. G. Kries, 816 Lindsey st., was hostess at a meeting of the Woman's auxiliary of the Westminster Presbyterian church which was held at her home Friday afternoon. After the usual business had been disposed of the time was spent socially. Refreshments were served to 25 members by the assistant hostesses, Mrs. C. C. Callahan, Mrs. A. M. Bells and Mrs. J. B. Fields. Circle No. 1 will entertain with a tea at the church May 14 and the next regular meeting of the auxiliary will be held May 21, the place to be announced later.

Revelations of a Wife
My Heart and My Husband

BY ADELE GARRISON

WHAT MADGE DETERMINED SHE WOULD DO.

My father's strange question startled me most disagreeably, not because I was unwilling to give up the check he had given me, but because I knew that he would never have asked me concerning its disposal were it not that some unusual and dire necessity had arisen in his life to make such an action necessary.

I was determined, however, that no hint of my perturbation should show in my face, and I schooled my voice to matter-of-fact tone as I answered him.

"No, it's still in my lock box," I did not tell him of the feeling of uneasiness, of something menacing, which had made me refrain from depositing his check, a most generous one, to my bank account.

A Brave Effort.

"I am very glad," he said frankly. "Within the next few days, before I can get in any more funds, I expect some unusually heavy drafts upon my bank account. If it will not inconvenience you to hold that check until I notify you that it will be all right to deposit it, I shall be most grateful. It will be only a short time—"

Pathetic indeed was the effort he made to make his request sound casual and ordinary. But my thoughts leaped at once to the woman who had so startled him in the cafe upon the occasion of our "celebration dinner."

Just what connection the sinister expression I had seen upon her face that night had with my father's sudden financial embarrassment I couldn't fathom. But I was sure that the two facts were closely related, even as I hastened to reassure him concerning the check.

"Why, of course, father!" I said heartily. "I didn't intend to use any of the money from that check for a long, long time, so there isn't the slightest need of my depositing it in fact—"

I stopped abruptly. I had thoughtlessly begun to offer to return the check, but a sober second thought, a look at my father's face warned me that such an offer would grievously offend him. It had been humiliation enough for him to be compelled to ask for my delay in cashing it. I must tread warily if I wished to help him "save his face."

Well, they're married. Thank goodness—I'm tired of reading about them—the war mother and the nameless baby, and the forgiving wife, who took her husband's sweetheart and her child home to stay with her, till her husband's brother made up his mind to marry her.

The papers have fairly reeked with pictures and interviews and descriptions. The war mother was so sweet, and shy, and timid. The war wife was so noble and broad-minded and tolerant. The brother-in-law who offered to marry his brother's sweetheart, was so perfectly grand, so high-minded and unselfish—he had to smile every time he thought of it—didn't you notice that smile in the snapshots?

Husband? Oh, nobody said very much about husband. He had his share of attention—in France, when he made love to the girl, and forgot to tell her that he was married. And now, everybody is writing articles about it, and having discussions and talking about the new morality and in Chinese fashion. "It is as safe as if it were in the bank," I finished gayly, if lamely. "And now, do come up and see the check he had given me, but because he is pulling himself up in his carriage and doing various other acrobatic tricks. I do hope he won't choose a circus trapeze as a career."

I made a most determined effort during the next half-hour to banish all unpleasantness from my father's thoughts, and with the aid of luncheon's winsome baby blandishments I think I succeeded for a space in making him forget whatever demon of care was perching upon his shoulder. But all the time my own thoughts were busy with the problem his odd actions presented, wondering how best I could help him.

For, although I had no reason for so thinking, I could not avoid the conviction that in some mysterious manner his perturbation, the sudden drafts upon his recently restored income were connected with my own personality, that his love for me was at the bottom of whatever was troubling him. His words at the cafe table came back to me:

"It can never touch you, shall never touch you."

Something else flashed through my brain disturbingly—the memory of the look of recognition and of terror, unmistakable, though fleeting, which the strange woman's face had registered upon that night. If I only could find that woman and confront her I was sure that I could wrest from her the secret of my father's queer actions.

But the proverbial needle in a haystack seemed a trivial problem when contrasted with that involved by a search for the woman of the cafe. I didn't dare ask my father a single question about her, and knew absolutely nothing concerning her. I might search for months and find no trace of her.

Then, as had happened so frequently before, the thought of Lillian Underwood came to me like a sudden gleam of a light upon a dark and terrifying corner.

Lillian, with her poise, her experience, had loved the numbers, the avenues of information which were open to her—surely if it were a humanly possible thing Lillian could and helping take care of the child of such an affair?

Could you do it?

I have known women to do it—good women, true women, women who would not permit a foolish girl to stand the consequences of her folly—alone.

I have known other women to do it—clever women, true women, women who would not permit a foolish girl to stand the consequences of her folly—alone.

Somehow I never envied the husband of any of these women—for I could never believe that a woman of real pride who really loved her husband would ever think of doing such a thing.

Once I crossed the ocean with a man and his second wife and his daughter, who was the child of his first wife.

And at the pier this trio was met by the first wife, who came to spend a month or so with her child, her first husband and his second wife. Passengers on the steamer said quite a few things about the situation. Some of them thought the first wife showed great common sense and the second wife great confidence in her husband and in herself to permit and sanction such an arrangement.

I couldn't see it at all. It seemed to me perfectly plain that none of them really cared in the least for the other, or ever had, or ever could.

Love is not built upon logic or even upon convenience. There are some principles so deep-rooted in the human heart that not all the "advanced thought" in the world will ever tear them out, and to my mind this is just and right.

I knew a man once who went abroad on some important business, and while he was gone, his wife ran away with the man's most intimate friend.

When the man came home, he went after his wife, and took her back, and was very nice to her, and never said a word to his friend about what had happened.

Do you consider such a man noble, high-minded, forgiving?

I do not. I consider him low, and animal, and self-indulgent.

Few Like These.

His wife was a convenience to him, and he did not choose to lose that convenience for any consideration whatsoever. He acted as dogs and every other lower animal act. Why should we glorify such a return to the lower form of instinct? Maybe his brother's child will be happy with his new wife—I hope he will.

But if I were in his place, I think I would move a few miles away from my brother and his amiable and complaisant wife, and then I should be a little careful about the visitors to my home.

The wife herself? Ah, that is another story—but of the same sort. Why philosophize at all about such an extraordinary situation? There are very few persons like these in the world, thanks be to good old Human Nature.

Let's not worry about them a minute longer.
