CARPENTERS REMAIN ON ELKHART STRIKE

Special to The News-Times:

GOSHEN, Ind., April 18.—Sixty union carpenters here who are on strike met last night when it was expected overtures would be made to end the trouble with seven contractors here, which broke out several weeks ago and which has been in the form of a strike since April 2.

Expectations, however, were not realized. Nothing was done at the meeting that could be construed as overtures to end the strike. The union men declare they will not back down from their demands and the contractors are equally positive they will not yield to the ultimatum of the men who have quit work.

It is admitted, however, that the closed shop issue is the principal obstacle to early settlement of the strike.

System in doing the work is just as important as good equipment and the housekeeper whose work "is never done" is often one who never stops to plan out her work to save time nor tries to prevent unnecessary steps by thinking ahead.

Revelations of a Wife

My Heart and My Husband

BY ADELE GARRISON

WHAT MADGE FACED WHEN SHE RETURNED FROM LILLIAN'S.

My relief at transferring the problem of the woman in the cafe to Lillian's capable hands was augmented by the knowledge, palpable to more inexperienced eyes than mine, that my friend's undertakings of the work was a godsend to her.

She had brooded so long over the tangled web in which her life and those of Harry Underwood and Robert Savarin were enmeshed that she sorely needed the stimulus of some outside and absorbing interest. This my father's problem gave her, because of her love and friendship for me.

I had no scruples about allowing her to expend her utmost effort in the matter, for I feared from the few words she had spoken concerning Robert Savarin, that she had lost all her usual poise and mental clearness in her judgment of him, and that if she were left to herself the consequences might be grave.

Since the artist's faltering words, "I tried to bring you definite news of him, but when I reached the prison camp he had gone," I had cherished no further doubt of his innocence of any attempt upon Harry Underwood's life. Lillian, however, I was sure, was still obsessed with the fear that there had been a tragic meeting between the two men.

It showed clearly in her emotion, her lined face, her haunted eyes. I hoped that this search for my father's Nemesis would remove her far enough from her own affairs to allow a sweeping breeze of common sense to blow away the mental cobwebs which were unmistakably woven across her mentality.

The hope was distinctly strengthened by Lillian's parting words to me when I left her to return to Marvin.

Parting Advice.

"Now, you're to stop worrying," she said, and I noted with joy that the old, capable ring was in her voice, the old light of interest in her eyes. "I'll see to everything at this end and we'll save your poor father's pocketbook and peace of mind in spite of himself. Now remember your part. Don't be too scrupulous. Avail yourself of any piece of information concerning your father's dealings with the lady that comes in your way."

"You don't mean to open his letters!" I replied in horrified protest.

"Look here, child!" she said impatiently. "You know my opinion, I trust, of the person who opens another's letters ordinarily. But we're dealing with a particularly unpleasant variety of reptile. I would have no more qualms at opening a letter of hers than I would of crushing a cobra if it strayed across my path."

"If by hook or crook you can get hold of any trace of that woman's whereabouts you put that Puritan conscience of yours in the bottom of your trunk, sit on the lid, turn the key, and then freeze on to the information. Good-by. You'll miss your train if you don't hurry."

She embraced and kissed me warmly, then fairly pushed me out of the door. I knew that she thus hastened my departure so I should be unable to protest further and though all my instincts and training rebelled against her dictum, yet my common sense, always the quality to which Lillian most forcibly appealed, told me she was right.

I had gone into the city directly from school, and had come home on an early evening train, but I found that Katie had left me a generous portion of home dinner, covered in the warming oven of the kitchen stove, and Dicky was lounging around the house, distinctly sulky, but evidently relieved at seeing me.

Why Dicky Knew.

"Funny thing you can't stay at home," he began in a much injured voice. "I should think you were away enough all day and every day without rushing off to town even before you come home. I got home early tonight, thought you'd perhaps like to take a run over to Creethaven—I see they have a mighty good program at that little movie place over there—and then get a bite to eat at that new inn that's just been opened to the Merriam road. Hungerson, who lives out that way, says it's one taggerne of a place—but what do I find when I get here? No wife, no chance of a trip, no nothing! What's the answer, anyway?"

Now I had risked no argument with my mother-in-law, but the telephone by telling her that I was going to Lillian's—I had simply informed her that I had been called to the city and would not be home for dinner. I knew that she was listening from her armchair by the fire, cause Dicky's manner was so aggressive. I replied rather shortly: "The answer is that I had important business in the city and attended to it."

"Well, it couldn't have been school business," Dicky returned hotly. "At any rate it wasn't so important that Miss Dean knew anything about it or your going in."

Some flowers in the garden will add materially to its beauty. A row of poppies or others which bloom along about the time the vines start to die brightens up the brown spots considerably.

Every household pays for ice whether they use it or not.

This is a bold statement but absolutely true.

Every household uses food and that food may not spoil, but it deteriorates enough to pay for ice, unless it is kept in a cool place.

Ice for family use only costs six-tenths of a cent per pound.

It pays to use ice.
