RASPBERRIES ALL
SUMMER AND LATE
IN FALL, POSSIBLE

Fresh Home Grown Fruit is Prospect For Gardeners Who Plant Species.

Fresh home grown raspberries all summer long and until frost comes in the fall. That is the delightful prospect which the United States department of agriculture holds out to the gardener who will plant one or more of the autumn-fruiting varieties of raspberry plants which it recommends. The department points out that European gardeners have grown autumn-fruiting varieties for many years, and some of them are of highest quality. It is particularly important that the American gardener secure varieties that will survive in this country, since in many sections our climate is too severe for the European varieties.

Two good autumn-fruiting varieties, the Ranere (St. Regis) and Erskine (Erskine Park) have originated in the United States and are now in the nursery trade. The Ranere was found near Hammond, N. J., and was grown by the hundreds of acres on the sandy soils of southern New Jersey before being introduced into the trade. It is the principal commercial raspberry of New Jersey, and seems destined to become the leading sort along the Atlantic coast states as far south as southern Georgia. The variety may be found fruiting freely throughout the fall months in Atlanta, Ga., and even farther south where other varieties do not succeed.

Northern Varieties.
In the cooler parts of the northern states, the Ranere produces fruit of too small size and of too poor dessert quality to be of great value. However, the berries borne on the young shoots in the autumn are larger in size and better in quality than those of early summer, and if pruned after the English system, where the old canes are cut out in autumn or early spring, it should be desirable in many northern gardens.

The Erskine raspberry, which was found a resident of Leo, Mass., in a patch of the Mariboro, bears larger fruit than the Ranere. The fruit is also of better quality, and if it proves as hardy and bears as well throughout the northern states as it has under the care of the one who discovered it, it should be especially desirable.
