The Undergraduates, Oxford.

As for the modern undergraduate, as a rule he is the most quiet and peaceable of mortals and has long since given up such violent delights as wrenching off door-knockers, assaulting policemen or squaring up to barges. Not that he is the least deficient in spirit or courage, as those who have watched the football matches in the parks will readily testify, but, except at such licensed saturnalia as a college "rag" or a bump supper, he keeps his voice and temper under perfect control and cultivates a dignified repose of manner which would do credit to a member of White's or Arthur's. Anything like loudness or ostentation is vetoed as bad taste and it may be added that his dress is as quiet as his deportment.
