CAPITOL DRAWS FAIR VISITORS

In Washington there is a continual World's Fair in progress year in and year out. In fact, this World's Fair has been in progress for over a century; for each administration from George Washington to Franklin Roosevelt has contributed definitely toward making Washington the wonder fair city of all the world.

To the vacationist, the nation's headquarters offers much that satisfies practically every varied interest. The Capitol and White House are the No. 1 group attractions because they are unquestionably the focal point of American interest.

The Washington Monument — the Lincoln Memorial, regarded by many as the architectural gem of the country — the Arlington National Cemetery where the nation's heroes — generals and admirals — blue-jackets and privates — the tomb of the Unknown Soldier, where both the mast of the Maine and the temple of fame are reverently preserved — all provide satisfaction to our emotional urge to pay homage.

The city of Washington is the mecca of American travelers this year more than ever because as W. G. Brown, traffic manager of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad says, "This year we find travel to Washington more popular than ever. People always want to visit Washington. That's, of course, one answer, but in addition, the majority of our own B. & O. World's Fair travelers want to stop off at their nation's capital en route."

Administering doses of castor oil to boys charged with minor offenses is cutting down juvenile delinquency in Alamosa, Colo., according to Police Chief Robert Peel.

In 3,521 years of the world's recorded history, only 268 years have been without war, Col. R. H. Cushing told an audience in Lancaster, N. Y. He also estimated that during the same period, 8,000 treaties were signed and were observed an average of two years each.

ARE YOU "OVERDRIVING" YOUR HEADLIGHTS?"

The next time you feel inclined to boast about the speed record you set the other night between Hometown and Big City consider these facts released today by the Tripp Safety Foundation of Chicago.

If your head lamps are in perfect condition, you have safe vision for 235 feet ahead at 45 mi. per hour. However, the average head lamp provides safe vision for only 150 feet. If you drive at 45 miles per hour, it requires 200 feet to stop with the average brakes. Fifty feet of this distance is "driver's reaction" time.

Thus, with average head lamps, average brakes and average driver reaction, you are "overdriving your headlights" eighty-five feet if you drive 45 miles per hour on the highway at night. In other words you have no margin of safety.

Overdriving the headlights is one of the major causes of night accidents, according to R. R. Whipple, chief engineer of the Tripp Safety Foundation, who showed, too, that the hazards of night driving are greatly increased when the air contains rain, snow, dust or fog.

You are overdriving your headlights, according to Whipple, when your braking distance exceeds the distance of your head lamp beam.
