Many new species have been added to the exhibit this year while all the favorites from former years will again share in the visitor's attention.

The family of black bears, the mother wolf and her five cubs, raccoon, coyotes, skunks, fox, and other animals, including the beaver and muskrat, will be exhibited. Birds and waterfowl will include owls, pheasants, quail, geese, ducks, teal, grouse and partridge; while the snake exhibit will include the poisonous rattler and copperhead and the non-poisonous black, garter, water, chicken and indigo snakes.

The fish display can be divided into three general classes—the game fish—bass, bluegills, pike and trout; the coarse fish—carp, suckers, quillback and shad, and the undesirable species—gar, dogfish and hellbenders. This is the only opportunity that most Hoosiers have to see and compare as many different species of fish as are found in Indiana waters.

Attendants will be on duty at the various displays making up the conservation exhibit, ready to answer questions and give information on Indiana's conservation program and activities.
