College Students Study Affect of Pesticides On Fish At Dewart Lake

Three Earlham college students are working on a grant from the National Science Foundation at the Earlham Biological Station. The station is located near Quaker Haven at Dewart Lake.

The purpose of the study is to subject fish to 15 various pesticides and observe the diverse affects which result.

It is hoped that the students can uncover a key to how a certain pesticide injures or kills a fish, and how it affects different organs of a fish. The study consists of morphological or outer affects and distological or cellular affects.

The young men are using pesticides furnished by the Indiana state board of health and bluegills furnished by the Wawasee Fish Hatchery. The tests began last year and are running from June 12 thru August 7 this summer. If the students have promising results this summer the research will be continued next year.

Also at the biological station are three students from DePauw university and 12 others from Earlham college who are taking a course available there or working on projects of their own.
