Amendment Up To Legislatures

By BIRCH BAYH

U. S. Senator

WASHINGTON, D. C. — After a year and a half of study, hearings and debate, a proposed constitutional amendment to assure presidential continuity has been approved by two-thirds of both houses of Congress and has been submitted to the states for ratification.

If three-fourths (or 38) of the state legislatures concur in Congress' action, the proposal will become the 25th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

It has been a humbling experience for me, a relative newcomer to the Senate, to have had the opportunity to frame a constitutional amendment and be designated as its floor manager.

Dozens of people—in and out of the Congress—contributed to the language of the amendment and to its eventual success in the House and Senate.

The amendment provides means by which we will never lose a Vice President and a formula by which the Vice President may act as President when the Chief Executive is disabled. To fill a Vice Presidential vacancy, whenever that office becomes vacant for any reason, the President would nominate a successor who would become Vice President upon confirmation by a majority of both houses of Congress.

Whenever the President, for any reason, believes himself unable to perform the duties and exercise the powers of his office, he may so declare. Then the Vice President would become Acting President until the President declared that no inability existed.

If the President is unable or unwilling to declare himself disabled, the Vice President may do so if he has the concurrence of a majority of the President's Cabinet. The Vice President would then become Acting President. (The amendment permits Congress, by law, to create any other body to supersede the Cabinet in making the determination of disability. The Vice President would still be required to concur, however, to make the declaration valid.)

In the highly unlikely circumstance that the President on one hand, and the Vice President and Cabinet majority on the other hand, disagree over the President's ability to discharge the powers and duties of his office, the issue would be resolved by the Congress. The President would resume his powers and duties unless two-thirds of both houses of Congress declared he was disabled. The Congress would have a maximum of 21 days in which to decide the issue. If Congress could reach no decision within that time, the President would automatically return to power.

The amendment is designed to guarantee that whatever crisis may confront our nation, there will always be capable hands at the helm of government. Through sheer luck, we have "limped," unprotected, through three serious cases of Presidential inability — Presidents Garfield, Wilson, and Eisenhower. Through sheer luck, we have never lost a President and Vice President within the same four-year term of office—although for 38 years of our history, we have been without a Vice President.

I introduced this amendment shortly after the assassination of President Kennedy. After exhaustive hearings, it passed the Senate, 65-0. It was necessary to start over again in 1965, because we were beginning a new Congress—the 89th. It passed the Senate again, 72-0, and then it passed the House, 369-28. The minor differences in the House and Senate versions of the amendment were harmonized and, last week, it passed both chambers again—by voice vote in the House and by 68-5 in the Senate.

I am hopeful that within two years, it will receive the necessary number of ratifying legislatures to become the 25th Amendment. Then all of us, I believe, will be able to breathe somewhat easier knowing that a gap in our fundamental law—a gap that could lead to the chaos of leadershiplessness in time of crisis—has been forever closed.
