Maybe that's why affairs never last more than 15 months

The bounds of love are not endless after all.

A study by a California State Polytechnic University professor concludes that the average love affair lasts just 15 months.

Professor F. B. Meeker, associate professor of psychology, interviewed 106 men and women whose romances had just ended and found that 94 per cent felt they would fall in love again and that 87 per cent expected the new love to be as intense as the old.

Meeker found that men cited sex as the single most important factor in keeping a relationship going. Women put sex fifth on the list, below such factors as love, meeting mutual needs and similarity of attitudes and beliefs.
