Philip K. Fawley: Says grammar has to relate to speaking habits

By JIM BRODERICK
Staff Writer

Philip K. Fawley, English teacher at Wawasee High School, has some provocative ideas about the way the world works.

On television: "TV destroys creativity. All you have to do is sit there like a sponge and absorb sensationalized, cheap programs."

Profile

On Shakespeare: "We have to get rid of the fear and apprehension people have of Shakespeare. He's not some god to be looked at on a pedestal."

On teaching grammar: "It has to relate to each student's personal speaking habits, or teaching it is a waste of time."

On himself: "Somedays, I'm very formidable. I like to think, however, that I'm also quite approachable."

Fawley, a teacher since 1949, will have a chance to sort out his feeling about awards, as well, when he is honored at the Fall Conference luncheon of the Indiana Council of Teachers of English on Saturday, Oct. 12, at Ball State University.

Fawley is one of 14 Indiana teachers named "Hoosier Teacher of English" by the ICTE. He received this distinction on the basis of his outstanding abilities in the classroom, involvement in sponsorships within the school, and recommendations by administrators, parents, and students. Charles D. Blaney, executive director of the ICTE said Fawley's achievements were "clearly outstanding."

Fawley teaches classes in college prep English, grammar, composition, and world literature. "The overall emphasis of my classes is learning to write with skill," Fawley said.

Most of the writing is done about works of literature the students are required to read. Fawley allows students to choose from a small but sophisticated reading list, whose authors include Sartre, Camus, and Kafka. "I push my students hard, but they don't mind it," he said.

Fawley maintains a realistic attitude regarding the subject of English, realizing many students fail to find it as stimulating as he does. "I'm sure it gets rather hum-drum for the students. A lot of things you have to know for life are not exciting, but you have to learn them."

Fawley maintains that classroom learning is only one way for a student to gain knowledge. "Being a well-balanced student is important. A good social life has a place in each student's formation," he said.

For that reason, Fawley never gives his students what he terms "busy work." He explains: "Giving homework just to give homework is insane...there's no point to it." Instead, Fawley encourages his students to remain aware and a part of the world in which they live. "The person who doesn't get involved with the various resources of communication really can't see where he or she belongs in society," he said.

The resources he consults range from several weekly newspapers, three daily newspapers, Time, Newsweek, and U.S. News and World Report news magazines, to television. "Yes, even I watch some T.V.," he said. As a reliable source of news, Fawley favors Peter Jennings ("easy to watch...does a good job.") over Dan Rather ("A bit alarmist.").

When he's not busily digesting the news of the world, Fawley gives vent to his creative talents as an accomplished pianist and organist. He's been playing for more than 50 years.

There's more. Fawley keeps abreast of current movements in fiction, although he admits he's "not too impressed with any of our contemporary fiction writers."

The remainder of his time is spent writing letters. "I'm an avid letter writer," he said. "I believe people enjoy getting letters more than just a phone call."

Despite his vast knowledge and experience, Fawley has a soft spot in his heart for those who are perhaps not as learned as he is. "There's no shame in saying 'I don't know.' Sometimes, we all have to face up to not knowing something, and just stand up and say 'Here I am, and I don't know.'"

Another lesson from a man with much to teach.
