

eff. It will be to render Austria, one of the secondary powers of Europe. The emperor may yet be allowed to wear the shadow of a crown, but if Bonaparte live, Europe will be filled with his family of kings.

The war, under the auspices of England, assumed a character which Bonaparte will not easily forget or forgive; it was rendered personal to himself; the cause of legitimate kings, as they were called against an usurper. The emperor of Austria will now have reason to rue this folly; Bonaparte has hence adopted it as a maxim, that his best security is to have no kings on the continent but those of his own creation. Jerome, Joseph, the duke of this and the duke of that, are not made kings merely upon their own account; they are part of the system of Bonaparte, according to which he is about to hedge and encircle France by feudatories of his own family. In this manner all Europe is cemented into one system and every prince has an interest to defend him, who in turn supports them all.

Extracts of the registers of the conservative senate, of Tuesday, 15th of August, 1809.

The conservative senate assemble to the number of members prescribed by the 90th article of the act of the constitutions of the 22d Frimaire, year 8.

Deliberating upon the communication which were made to them by his serene highness the prince arch chancellor of the empire, in sitting of the 14th of this month.

After having heard the report of their special committee appointed in the same sitting.

Decree, that upon the object of the said communications, there shall be made to his majesty the emperor and king, an address of the following tenor:

"Sire,
"The prince arch chancellor of the empire has just made known to the senate the military events of Zealand is this moment the theatre;—and your majesty's minister of war has just communicated to us the report which he made to the council of ministers, presided by his serene highness concerning these events.

"The enemy of the repose of Europe, has landed his troops upon two islands of Zealand. The cry of war, directly resounded upon the French shores. All the neighboring departments answered this cry, which for the French was always the cry for victory and the brave national guards flew from all sides to avenge the violation of the territory of a neighboring and allied nation.

"Under these memorable circumstances, sire, the senate, who share in so lively a manner all the sentiments of the French people, have need of expelling them to your majesty.

"Let all hopes vanish upon the banks of Thames. Never will a more noble enthusiasm have animated the French people.

"Your majesty, sire, (the brave fellows of the interior of the empire conjure your majesty will not withdraw from the banks of the Danube nor from those of the Tagus, any of those invincible legions which have so often had the happiness of fighting before your majesty's eyes, and no thing will delay the moment so much desired by you, when the olive of peace will rise above your triumphal eagles.

"Wherever there are Frenchmen, there will be an army; and whenever they receive the signal of combat, the genius of your majesty will animate them, because they every where experience the same devotedness, the same admiration of your majesty.

"They, who being more distant from the new fields of glory which victory is preparing in the name of honor, of the country and of Napoleon, cannot reach the enemies cohorts without crossing a great part of your empire, will feel no other pain than the fear of arriving only to crown their brothers with the civil and military laurel.

"Hands will not be wanting to hurl those dreadful thunderbolts which your majesty's exalted foresight had caused to be prepared along the whole coast of your empire.

"The wisdom of the prince depository of your confidence the devotedness of your ministers, and the zeal of all the civil and military chiefs, have seconded these generous movements.

"These veterans of glory, who long sighed at not following your majesty to the midst of battles, are going to direct by their experience the warlike fight of your young Frenchmen. They will show them the noble plains with which your majesty has covered their noble fears.

"Illustrious generals, chosen by your majesty, and filled with your spirit, march at their head.

"Seven senators share this shining honor.

"Your ships of the Scheldt, protected by formidable batteries, and protecting them in their turn, double the barrier of iron and fire which bounds the shores bordering upon Zealand.

"The Dutch nation, whose territory is attacked is raising with pride its ancient banners which call to mind so many grand exploits of the various Bavarians; and your august brother who reigns over them is at their head.

"All advance under the irresistible influence, present in all places, of the greatest of heroes; the English will soon be driven back to their ships.

"Ah! if we could cease to listen for a moment to the voice of humanity, with what ardour we should with that their cohorts, daring to remove from the waves destined to favor their approaching flight, would advance upon the sacred land of the French, no Englishman would again behold the roof of his family.

"The wrecks of their arms, sire, will be the trophies with which the French people will ornament those numerous triumphal arches which their gratitude is going to raise along the triumphal road of the greatest of commanders, and of the most beloved of sovereigns, returning from the fields of Austria, at the head of his immortal armies, and causing victory to proclaim the peace of the continent.

"Vouchsafe, sire, to receive with benevolence, the fresh homage of the respect, devotedness and fidelity of the senate."

HORRID OUTRAGE.

Through different channels we are informed that on Saturday night, Dr. William Boyles and his wife, of Long Hill, in this county, were both shot, as they were seated by the fire, by some person outside of the house. It is stated that the guns were pointed through the window; and that the contents of one of them passed thro' his throat, and the other wounded his wife in the breast. It is added that the lives of both, (and particularly his) are endangered. We do not understand that the monsters in human shape, who committed the act, have yet been discovered; as the darkness of the night favoured their escape, as well as the execution of their diabolical purposes.—It is to be hoped, however, they may soon meet the retribution due to such atrocious crimes.
