

POETICAL ASYLUM.

SONG.

BY MRS. OPIE.

I've roam'd thro' many a weary round,
I've wander'd east and west,
Pleasure in ev'ry clime I found.
But sought in vain for rest.

While glory sighs for other spheres,
I feel that one's too wide,
And think the home which love endears
Worth all the world beside.

The needle thus, too rudely woo'd
Wanders unconscious where,
Till having found the place it lov'd
It tremblingly settles there.

THE NEWSPAPER.

There is no gratification so useful and agreeable, which can be obtained at a price so moderate as a newspaper. It has a full sheet of paper handed you every week, for 2 or 3 dollars a year—detailing all the important facts that happen in the world—stating to you the measures of your government—the conduct of your public functionaries—the movements of your armies and navy—useful discoveries—deaths & marriages—essays, political, moral and humorous—poetry—advertisements—what a mass of matter.

But their usefulness in a family where there are children is particularly observable. Let one family take a paper and another be without one—Let the children in every other particular have the same advantages of education; and it may be distinctly observed that those who have the chance to see the paper are far the most intelligent, and improve much the most rapidly. A good newspaper is almost equal to a school. A thousand facts, useful and pleasing to know, are learned and treasured up, & the persons can hardly tell where they obtained them. There is scarcely any intelligent man of 35 who cannot tell you all the material events of the French revolution and the history of Bonaparte. Where was it learned? From the newspaper almost exclusively.

Suppose newspapers were struck out of existence what a cloud of thick darkness would rest upon us! Notwithstanding all the other sources of information remained to us, and the art of printing books continued, we should still grope our way in comparative ignorance. And if the newspapers are not sufficiently valuable to file, they are nevertheless worth half the cost to put up garden seeds for the women—to cut out patterns for the girls—to wrap up papers for the lawyer—to light cigars for the tavern-keeper—to roll up tobacco for the merchant or to make kites for the boys. Who then would not take a newspaper?
