

Britain insists on her right to regulate the entry of American ships and produce into her American colonies, as she pleases: and we insist upon the right of regulating the entry of British ships and British produce from these colonies, as we please—Surely, the parties may please themselves, and reciprocate either free trade, or restrictions upon trade, as they like, without getting angry about it! Britain has the same right to forbid the use of our bread stuffs in her colonies as severely as she does in the "United Kingdom"—and how it is that some are so sensitive as to the former, and so cold in respect to the latter, we cannot imagine. Now, we would gently meet regulation with regulation, or free trade with free trade—as Britain wills, so would we. She excludes the product of our farmers—we should exclude the product of hers, sent hither in the shape of clothes and cottons.—There is no difficulty about this, nor need there be any. Either nation may take a stand for itself, without offending the other. We would "go to the whole" in accommodation, if Britain is disposed to accommodate; or in restriction, if Britain is most pleased to restrict. Our right of reciprocity must not be battered for a "mess of pottage"—nor shall British agents and writers seduce us into submission. In sincerity and truth, we wish, "peace, commerce and honest friendship" with Great Britain—but we cannot, as the terms of either, yield up to her any more than she will yield unto us. There should not be the least hesitation about this in the mind of any true-hearted American, nor is there. We are all of one mind. "The British party in America" may shew itself in the newspapers, but the power that it once had has departed—never, never to return. The "American system" is put in opposition to the British system—and the former must and will be far her advanced, unless the latter recedes—restriction being increased on our part as restriction exist on the other, until it shall be shown which is the most independent of the other. These are the doctrines of the "old school," and they are dear to the peoples of the U. States.—Niles's Reg.
